Doron,

It was good to talk to you yesterday.

Following our conversation, it appeared to me that there is another consideration that may relevant for Ehud:

Forbes is a serious media platform. The story will be told either way (with or without ehud's and my contribution), and will establish the basis for anything that may be communicated afterwards in the US. I think this is a good opportunity for Ehud to present his perspective and influence the narrative.

I believe that the Forbes team is friendly and not looking for the political aspects. This is mainly a business story, albeit, with the sensationalist aspect of Tzeelim .

There is no intention by them to discuss the tactical, operational details, or the political, legal aspects. The article is (unfortunately) about me.

Ehud can help by clarifying:

1. That I am not a "bad guy"
2. That I am not a "criminal" (who was formally convicted for negligence) 3. That I am not a persona-non-grata in Israel

The more he contributes on the above areas, the less work I have to do to secure my own flank.

Thoughts?

Thanks again,

Doron

Doron,

I hope this mail finds you well.

Do you have time for a quick call?

Thanks,

Doron
